

As the parent of a minor child I have two points of feedback for consideration in future policies:

- Federally regulated transportation should be required to have epinephrine injectors available as part of their first-aid services and all staff should be trained in recognizing an allergic reaction and in administering an auto-injector.

- Food providers in transportation terminals and also food that is provided onboard while in transit should be clearly labelled on the package and menu, and allergen awareness information should be made available to travelers online and onboard (electronic or printed).

Thank you!
